Indian flag to show his support for the cricketer for which he was arrested and 'charged under Pakistan's penal code' for 'acting against Pakistan's sovereignty', a charge that could lead to ten years of imprisonment and 'a fine' (Express Tribune 2016). Being anti-Indian as part of the citizenship discourse was also highlighted by Afzal's (2015) research on the Pakistan Studies curriculum and its role in shaping young students' perceptions about terrorism and intolerance in Pakistan. This anti-Indian sentiment is repeated in the discourse around Kashmir, which again is located in the pre-partition narrative that underlines the irreconcilable differences between Hindus and Muslims. This anti-Indian sentiment is also evident in the connection young people make to the 'sacrifices' of their forefathers for Pakistan, both at the time of partition and later on: 'Having [been] born here and holding the Pakistani NIC, but there is much more to it. I am a Pakistani more because my grandparents gave up everything in India and migrated to this land. It is their sacrifice that makes me Pakistani' (Student, Male, Lahore); 'The fact that my grandparents were actively involved during partition and not being Pakistani is not an option' (Student, Male, Lahore); 'Being born here, burying our relatives here and our attachment with our ancestors. The reason for which they laid their lives was to attain this piece of land. I think these things make us Pakistanis' (Student, Male, Sahiwal); 'Our elders sacrificed so much for Pakistan; they got Pakistan as an Islamic state with a passion. We need to set limits for it, work hard for its success and should not stop oneself for sacrifices for it, all this explanation is a symbol that I am a Pakistani' (Student, Male, Islamabad); 'Only those people were Pakistani who fought 1971 war and tied bombs on their chests and faced the cannons without any fear. But now this is not happening. We should show the youth this example of bravery and make them a true Muslim because this is what makes us Pakistani' (Student, Male, Sahiwal).

The sacrifices of the older generation at the time of independence translate into a sense of unquestioned loyalty to the ideology of Pakistan. While partition did create over one million dead, especially in Punjab where Hindus, Sikhs and Muslims butchered each other once the Radcliffe line was drawn in the sand and communities fled across the new border, the interpretation of this generational sacrifice is not, strictly speaking, correct as those Muslims in the previously Muslim majority provinces of Sindh, Balochistan, the Frontier and East Bengal did not have to die for Pakistan's creation. The history of those who migrated from India, the Muhajirs, seems to underlie Pakistan's nationalism and seems to have become the history of the whole nation. Education has of course played a significant role in this development through the curricula of Pakistan Studies in particular.
