The notion that the 'right kind of Islamic education' is the solution to all of Pakistan's problems was echoed by students in universities and teachers alike. This is similar to the response of teachers in Nazir's research on democracy and education in Pakistan for whom 'a good teaching of Islam' was sufficient to guarantee 'human rights education' in schools (2010, p. 336). However, the belief that the 'right' Islamic education is the answer overlooks the problem of interpretation and sectarianism that Nelson (2009, 2008) highlights in his research on religious education in Pakistan. As Nelson (2009) observes, 'religious and sectarian differences' were often 'the proverbial "elephant in the living room"' which no teacher or parent wants to acknowledge (p. 601). In this study, the problem of sectarianism was discussed with students and academics at universities. Their responses ranged from the belief that the problem of the 'right kind of Islamic education' can be resolved by selecting 'a scholar' of one's choosing and following him, while for others sectarianism was a result of misunderstanding religion. As a female student in a focus group at a single-sex government university observed: 'Religion is not taught properly. Deen ka nahi pata. Firqoon ki baat karte hain'[14] (Focus Group,[15] Government University). Others however pointed to the shortcomings of a strategy that aims to provide the 'right kind of Islamic education'; 'Religion is also a problem when everyone thinks that their religion is right' (Student, Female, Quetta). This is especially problematic when the state takes on the responsibility of defining what is the 'right Islamic education' and who qualifies as a Muslim. As one student in a focus group at a private university in Karachi highlighted: 'Look at our heroes. My parents in school knew about all the Ahmadi generals who fought in our wars, but during Zia's time all of them were removed from our books. We did not learn about them' (Focus Group,[16] Private University). The solution of providing the right kind of Islamic education completely overlooks the non-Muslim Pakistani identity. As an academic from the Hazara community teaching at a university in Lahore observed: 'Look at our textbooks, nothing has changed. We don't know about minorities in our country. How many religions are there?' He is right in pointing out that the textbooks do not teach about the different religions in Pakistan. Despite including a section on 'minorities' in the Pakistan Studies curriculum, the Grade 10 textbook published by the PCTB does not explain who the different minorities are. The only reference is to non-Muslim leaders or thinkers who are grouped together without distinguishing their religious identity. This is particularly problematic in the case of Abdus Salam who is included at the end of a paragraph on personalities in the field of law with one sentence – 'Doctor Abdus Salam rendered important
