services in physics' – and no mention of the fact that he is the first Nobel laureate of Pakistan (p. 139). This absence of recognition in the textbook that is meant to educate children about the achievements of different Pakistanis attests to the limitations of imagining the 'right kind of Islamic education' which is bound to exclude communities and identities that do not fall within the majority's 'version of Islam'. Abdus Salam belongs to the Ahmaddiya community.

While the need for the education system to teach the 'right kind of Islam' was one proposition in developing a better understanding of Pakistanis as Muslims, the education system was also seen as instrumental in promoting civic mindedness through citizenship education. As one student observed, 'Education could be made a lot more useful in (a) informing us about what the state does, (b) talking about rights and responsibilities' (Student, Female, Karachi). There was a recognition by some that the existing education system 'upto high school barely does anything to instil citizenship within us, we might be provoked towards patriotism but not to citizenship' (Student, Male, Islamabad). However, for many, fixing the education system that inculcates the importance of duties and responsibilities of citizens towards the state and vice versa, was the way forward. 'Education the only means of awareness' (Student, Female, Quetta). The role of education also needs to be situated within the broader spectrum of inequality, poverty and corruption. This was clearly highlighted by a teacher in Sindh who observed: 'Education can go some way in clarifying what citizenship means but if the basic needs of food, water and security are not available to the people a concept is of no consequence in their lives.'

The young people's voices show that education has not been successful in transferring the concept of citizenship from its primordial ethno-nationalist basis to an understanding of rights, responsibilities and political participation. This chapter demonstrates that the state has not managed to build a concept of citizenship among its citizens despite a strong sense of identity of what it means to be a Pakistani. In fact, the education system has over the decades since independence continuously narrowed what it means to be Pakistani, excluding increasing numbers of minority communities. Only those participants who belonged to minority identities raised the issue of non-Muslim Pakistanis and the absence of their narrative in the citizenship discourse of Pakistan. Moving forward the security state in Pakistan has further brought educational institutions into the security fold, with a national narrative that promotes resilience and tolerance being introduced in textbooks for Urdu, Islamiyat and English. However, given the deep ideological discourse on Islam and citizenship, this narrative on tolerance is also shaped through an Islamic lens.
