was most prevalent in the answers given by the students in [higher education]. In discussing their feelings of alienation and the elite's behaviour with regard to rights and duties, differences were observed based on school types again. Government schools and madrassas seemed to be most unhappy, expressing dismay at how the educated elite exploited the more disadvantaged. The students at private schools, mostly from the elites themselves gave explanatory style answers as to why the elites were taking advantage of their position vis-a-vis the poor. Interestingly there was less alienation or anger at the philanthropic schools, also reflected in their broad views of the elite' (Lall 2012, p. x).

8 The two madrassas chosen at random for the fieldwork all catered mainly to lower-middle-class and middle-class families. This was confirmed through the questionnaires where the students disclosed parental profession.

11 Hafeez's lawyer Rashid Rahman was gunned down for defending him. In Pakistan, the accusation of blasphemy is akin to a death sentence, where the accused are known to have been lynched or murdered by mobs, or killed in prison. Often lawyers, judges, journalists and media personnel are fearful of defending the accused because of the danger of being killed in the process, especially in the aftermath of the assassination of Punjab Governor Salman Taseer who defended a Christian woman, Asia Bibi, accused of blasphemy, and was killed by his own guard. Hafeez continues to be imprisoned in a 'high-security ward', awaiting trial.
