Balochistan – have succeeded in carrying out 7,311 terrorist attacks in Pakistan from January 2011 to mid-August 2016' that have 'claimed 9,689 lives and left 18,812 others injured' (2018, p. 352).[13] However, the security state's strategy of dealing with these terrorist threats have centred on strategic alliances which have historically backfired. During General Pervez Musharraf's term, attempts to counter extremist elements within Pakistan were led by his policy of 'enlightened moderation'. However, the policies of Musharraf towards right-wing political parties in Pakistan, his presumed strategic alliance with militants who were leading Pakistan's Kashmiri liberation strategy, and the complicated relationship with the Taliban, designated as the 'good' and 'bad' Taliban, resulted in creating further chaos and complicating the security situation in Pakistan. It was during Musharraf's rule that the Afghan Taliban and Al Qaeda–linked Arab and Uzbek fighters were able to enter KP, then known as the NWFP, and FATA. Sectarian and anti-Indian sectarian jihadi groups from Punjab were also able to establish bases in KP, sowing the seeds for what was to come. His alliance with the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA) facilitated Islamic extremism in other ways. In his attempts to challenge the political status quo of the PML(N) and the PPP, Musharraf through rigging ensured that the six-party Islamic alliance of the MMA won the 2002 provincial elections in KP, sidelining the PPP and the PML(N), Musharraf's main political rivals. The MMA lent their 62 (out of 342) seats in the National Assembly to support Musharraf's Seventeenth Amendment to the constitution that resulted in concentrating power in the hands of the president, in return for his support of the Hisba Bill that sought to introduce Taliban-style government in KP (passed in 2005 but struck down by the supreme court). The mutual support did not end there. As of 2004 the MMA's largest constituent party – the Jamiat Ulema-e Islam (F) (JUI-F) – mediated talks between the military and FATA-based militant groups, resulting in amnesties and political space for these anti-India and anti-Afghanistan groups. The 2005 earthquake allowed Kashmir-based militant groups such as the Lashkar-e-Tayyaba (LeT) and Jaish-e-Mohammed to relocate training camps to the PATA. Both the amnesty and the earthquake allowed for the spread of Taliban-style governance (such as the court systems) in FATA and PATA settled areas and militancy to spread across the tribal areas between 2004 and 2009. The TTP, although a loose umbrella organization, was able to exert influence across FATA and in the NWFP's Malakand district, where it supported the Sunni extremist Tehrik-e-Nifaz-e-Shariat-e-Mohammadi (TNSM).
