the Tehreek-i-Taliban Pakistan, killing forty-three people and injuring thirteen others (Ali 2015). As a result of the Rangers' operation, civilian deaths dropped to 40 per cent in 2014, to 65 per cent in 2015 and 74 per cent in 2016 (Hussain 2018).

Another terrorist campaign deserves a special mention in this chapter – the one waged against polio eradication campaigns and their workers. Since 2011 when the CIA designed a fake hepatitis campaign to find Osama Bin Laden, the Taliban have maintained that international immunization campaigns are fronts for espionage. With regard to polio in particular they claim that the vaccine will sterilize the children. As a result hundreds of polio workers have been killed across the country, but in particular in Karachi and Quetta, where both the vaccination centres and the door-to-door immunization workers are targeted (BBC News 2018b).

Beyond the mess in KP and the groups based in Punjab resulting in bombings, attacks and kidnappings in cities and across the country and a full-fledged war with the police and the army, an old ethnic-based conflict has re-erupted in Balochistan. Some of the violence is also sectarian, but the actual problem runs much deeper. In this case the disparity in security was captured by a student belonging to the Hazara community: 'What did you notice most about being in Lahore? There is no fear (khauf) in Lahore. In Quetta when we would have to go to the market I would wonder if I would get home alive, but Lahore is so safe. Here people go even for fun and can stay out till 10 p.m. without fearing for their life. In Quetta you only go out if you need to' (Student, Female, Quetta). NCEPG 2018 in examining the problems in Balochistan highlight how '[s]parse location of populations, entrenched sense of deprivation, ethnic divisions, share in NFC[26] award, provision of basic amenities, education facilities, health facilities, dispute resolution mechanisms, abolition of office of District Magistrate as central grievance redress point at district level, lack of a coherent narrative for national integration are issues of disenchantment and extremism' (NACTA 2018, p. 13). Balochistan has been an ethnically diverse province of Pakistan. It had its problems with the centre since independence, resulting in three initial insurgencies and the fourth, also known as the 1974 war. While internal tribal conflict has been a constant feature, Baloch nationalism has also emerged, challenging the federal state. The problems, however, seemed to increase under the rule of General Musharraf, when the fifth insurgency started over the rape of a female doctor by a member of the military in Sui in 2005. Musharraf's feud with seventy-nine-year-old Baloch leader Nawab Akhbar Khan Bugti, who had been both former governor and
