chief minister of Balochistan, led to a revival of the Balochistan crisis. In August 2006 Musharraf ordered the Pakistan army to go after Bugti and his men, resulting in Bugti's death in a cave that collapsed, as well as the death of thirty-seven of his fighters and twenty-one Pakistani army soldiers. This made the Nawab[27] a hero, galvanizing Baloch national sentiments across the province. After the Nawab's death, Musharraf's government's way of dealing with Baloch dissidents was to let them 'disappear'. This Orwellian 'disappearance' was attributed to security forces, with tortured bodies appearing after days or weeks. Such acts clearly challenged the writ of the state with the former chief justice of Pakistan Iftikhar Muhammad Chaudhry taking the security establishment, especially General Musharraf, to task. The cases of these disappeared led to Chief Justice Chaudhry's dismissal and the rise of the lawyers' movement in 2007, resulting eventually in Musharraf's fall from power. The reignited issue in Balochistan refused to rest and today much of the province is off limits to ordinary civilians and the press as the military is fighting Baloch nationalists who they claim want independence from Pakistan. The Baloch insurgency of 2006–16 is different in nature, being led by more radical 'new players' (Rais 2017, p. 163). Balochistan has also strategically become more important in the China–Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) through the development of the Gwadar port, with an investment of over $50 billion proposed by the Chinese president in 2015 for CPEC that will be instrumental in making trade more cost-effective (Hussain 2018). The military continues to be active in Balochistan, with operations that have included extrajudicial killings and enforced disappearances. The provincial government's efforts to negotiate a peace with Baloch insurgents have failed, since it cannot guarantee an end to the military violence. The military accuses the insurgents of collaborating with RAW – India's Intelligence Agency – making them prime targets (International Crisis Group 2015).[28] This narrative is also familiar to young Pakistanis.

For the young Pakistanis outside of Balochistan many are critical about the lack of information available about the province: 'I think the problem is that there is no information about what's happening in Balochistan. Also with regard to resource allocation. I check the government website about budget allocation to different provinces; there was nothing about Balochistan' (Focus Group, Private University[29]). 'No one really knows what's going on inside which is the biggest problem. We are kept in the dark' (Focus Group, Private University[30]). 'We don't know enough about Balochistan. There is a vacuum there left by political parties and then agencies are involved which is what they do. It is the same as the ISI[31] involved in Khalistan and Kashmir against India, and RAW involved in Balochistan'
