Baloch talk held outside (my university). … After listening to Mama Qadeer I have become sceptical of what he is saying. He outrightly said that he wants a separate Balochistan. I cannot support that' (Focus Group, Private University[36]).

While the Baloch struggle is the most important part of the Baloch question, issues around local governance pertaining to delivery of basic amenities and services was also questioned by the participants, particularly in connection with Sui gas. Sui, a region located in Balochistan, is the main supplier of natural gas to the entire country (Surendra 2009). However, the province itself struggles with getting gas from its own neighbourhood: 'Balochistan is exploited. We take gas from Sui, send it to all the provinces and what is left is given back to people in Sui. We take their resources, so of course they have every right to feel exploited' (Focus Group, Private University[37]). 'Yes I had a friend from Sui. She said they did not have enough gas, whereas Sui supplies everyone in the country' (Focus Group, Private University[38]). While some participants in this study believed that the other provinces had 'ganged up' against Balochistan others questioned the provincial government, and the local structures that exist within the province: 'Balochistan problem over resources, blame Punjabis, government to blame' (Focus Group, Government University[39]). Others blamed the corruption of the leaders in Balochistan that has resulted in the dismal conditions of the province. There were only a few instances in this research where participants were questioning the state-sponsored narrative of 'foreign interference' in the province. 'I don't agree with RAW being involved. The best way to win a conflict is to influence the narrative, so we blame everything on RAW. I think it is hypocritical to a certain extent if the state alleges that there is no ground reality for the Balochi demand' (Focus Group, Private University[40]).

Beyond the anti-nationalist military operation Balochistan has suffered some of the worst sectarian violence in the country, which has particularly targeted the Hazara community.

> Hazara community is imprisoned in its own neighbourhood. It took me 6 years to go from my neighbourhood to my own grandfather's neighbourhood who lives only a few kilometres away because it was so dangerous. We cannot speak the truth. We are jobless, innocent stuck in our neighbourhoods. There are twenty-eight different agencies operating, nobody knows. There is no place that is safe since we can't even hide because of our features.

There have been many attacks, but two in 2013 in Quetta stand out: the 10 January suicide car bomb attack that killed more than a hundred, mostly Shias,
