the norm across all students; that was clearly evident in the majority's support for military courts in providing swift justice.

Any discussion on terrorism in Pakistan is incomplete without examining the plight of its most vulnerable communities, the diverse 'non-Muslim' population. The nature of terror and extremism that the non-Muslim minority is subjected to in Pakistan can range from direct targeted attacks by militant outfits to an intolerant system of governance and laws that render them vulnerable to individual attacks. The Christian community in particular has been targeted. In 2013, two explosions in Peshawar at the All Saint's Church resulted in the deaths of nearly eighty people, with over a hundred injured (Sherazi 2013). In 2015, churches in Lahore were attacked by twin Taliban suicide attacks killing fifteen people and injuring over seventy (Gabol et al. 2015). The Christian community in Lahore was again targeted by the Taliban faction Jamaat ul-Ahrar on Easter in 2016 killing more than seventy people (Sherwood 2016). In Quetta in December 2017, nine people were killed and fifty injured after the Bethel Memorial Church was targeted, with Daesh taking responsibility for the attacks (Masood 2017). Christians are not only persecuted by Islamic terrorists, but also by the authorities through the use of the blasphemy law, which in the end plays into the hands of extremists. In November 2014 a Christian couple was burnt to death by a mob after being accused of blasphemy (Hashim 2015). In February 2018 a Christian man, Patras Masih, accused of blasphemy was apprehended by security forces and his cousin who was also interrogated by the police threw himself out of a window (Hashim 2018). The religious minorities continue to bear the brunt of an intolerant state and become easy targets for terrorist groups. The respondents were largely silent about the fate of minorities in Pakistan, showing again how marginalized these communities are.

The added complication to the problem of terrorism in Pakistan is the emergence of university-educated terrorists (see Appendix 2). According to Moeed Yusuf, young people are radicalized through 'socio-economic poverty, education systems based on curricula that breed close-mindedness, discouraging questioning and independent mindedness, and a religion-dominated ideological narrative' (UNDP 2017, p. 112), all factors present in Pakistan. Generally the narrative of a 'failed state due to the perceived weakness of the writ of the state – both geographical and ideological – will draw young people to extremism. However, it's not only the uneducated who are attracted to religious militancy' (UNDP 2017). Hussain (2018) argues that there are three reasons for the 'emergence of educated and urban militants': (1) 'unregulated cyberspace' that terrorist groups such as Daesh have 'exploited'; (2) Daesh's 'alternative jihadist
