where 'liberal minded lecturers' are believed to be under surveillance by the administration (Basharat 2017); the case of the University of Engineering and Technology (UET) Taxila campus where students are fighting for their rights to be treated as adult students; the case of professors being picked up by security agencies, or arrested for holding political views (Express Tribune 2017c); and the case of bloggers disappearing and being tortured for criticizing the security state (BBC News 2017a), all testify to a strengthening 'security' state, rather than a strong social contract. Furthermore, the security state's record of continuing to mainstream extremist groups into Pakistani politics contradicts this sentiment. In keeping with tradition these are the groups that are not seen as a threat to the Pakistani state and are able to serve as proxies against India.[44] According to the International Crisis Group, there is still no clarity on who is banned:

> According to the January 2015 National Action Plan (NAP) implementation progress report, 72 organisations 'have been declared as proscribed by the MOI [Ministry of Interior], and a comprehensive analysis/assessment review is underway to identify how many of the proscribed organisations are active [and] working under changed names'. Interior Minister Chaudhry Nisar instructed the ministry to revise the national list of banned organisations in line with the UN list. This was apparently done, and the revised list, which included 60 banned under the ATA and twelve by the UN, was placed on the NATCA website just before U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's January 2015 visit to Islamabad. The list was then taken off the website, because it included the Haqqani Network, the LeT/JD and the FIF charity front. On 20 January, a senior interior ministry official told the Standing Committee on the Interior that the LeT/JD and the Haqqani Network had not been banned. (International Crisis Group 2015, p. 11)

Until the Pakistani state together with its military disentangles itself from an ideology where geopolitical interests trump the security of its own citizens, the problem of terrorism in Pakistan will continue. In the words of a participant in this study: 'I think we have a delusional bubble about ourselves. We think everything is fine, everything is improving and if it isn't, it goes to India or God' (Focus Group, Private University[45]).

Notes

1 This focus group included participants from Hyderabad, Sukkur and Karachi.
2 These horrifying numbers do not show the much larger numbers of injured and the very large numbers of kidnappings that have blighted the lives of millions.
