need jobs.' As Chapter 3 shows, education has largely failed the young people of Pakistan. Despite maintaining a strong sense of national identity, they have little understanding of citizenship, nor does what they receive in school provide a sound basis for getting jobs. Today education is linked with the objectives of the security state through the National Counter Extremism Policy Guidelines (NCEPG) of 2018. Higher education institutions are increasingly becoming spaces of surveillance, rather than of critical thinking. It remains to be seen how the PTI-led government will make education relevant to the job market as well as giving young people an understanding of their wider role as citizens.

Security

In his speech Imran Khan also mentioned terrorism, especially the suicide attacks in Balochistan, and thanked the security forces for their service. Despite security and terrorism not featuring much during his first address, PTI's rhetoric is reflective of the National Internal Security Policy 2018–23 that focuses on countering extremism by strengthening the state–citizen relationship. In effect, the 'naya Pakistan' may be nothing more than the old establishment draped in the language of progress and human rights, with the security state remaining at the helm of power in Pakistan.

The problem not addressed here is the security state's record of continuing to mainstream extremist groups into Pakistani politics. Khan's own history points to positions that are more in line with those of the military, including his assertion that militancy in Pakistan was the result of the United States' ill-conceived war on terror rather than a history of support for militant proxies. Until the Pakistani state together with its military disentangles itself from an ideology where geopolitical interests trump the security of its own citizens, the problem of terrorism in Pakistan will continue. It is expected that some of this will be forced on the table as part of a review of Pakistan's relationship with the United States and the aid packages that are needed from the International Monetary Fund. Western institutions and governments are unwilling to continue to support Pakistan unless terrorism is addressed, leaving the PTI the choice between going it alone with China or engaging with the security issues in a meaningful way.

The 'right kind' of Islam

At the basis of the speech is a clear call to Pakistan's conservative religious communities: Imran Khan's vision of Pakistan is steeped in Islamic tradition –
