and the secession of East Pakistan. After six years of democratic rule under Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's PPP, General Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq imposed martial law and the expected elections were postponed. Zia changed Pakistan's constitution so that the democratically elected prime minister became subservient to the president. The most controversial power awarded to the office of the president was under Article 58(2)b, which gave the president the power to dissolve the National Assembly at his own discretion. Democratically elected governments resumed after Zia's death in 1988 for a decade, during which none of the four elected heads of state completed their legal term. General Pervez Musharraf took power in a coup in 1999. It was claimed that the army was forced to take this step to save the country from 'turmoil and uncertainty'. Today, even with a democratically elected government in place, the army is seen as the back-seat driver as the prime minister cannot decide on many domestic or foreign policy matters without the COAS's support (also see Shah 2019). Under Nawaz Sharif's government, there was no foreign minister, but an advisor to the prime minister on foreign relations, the portfolio remained directly under the prime minister's control. The COAS continues to make the important decisions related to foreign affairs, visiting important partners such as China and the United Arab Emirates.

All these fault lines are real and part of Pakistan's current issues. However, one consistent thread through all of them is the role played by the state in its treatment of its citizens, and how the citizens perceived the situation. This book argues that beyond these three typical explanations for Pakistan's political and economic woes lies a lack of 'citizenship' whereby Pakistanis, especially the youth, have neither a sense of rights and duties, nor an inclination for political participation. The issue of citizenship is linked to ethnic/provincial or sectarian identity when it comes to citizens' rights (or lack of rights for minorities) and lies at the heart of what kind of political participation is possible when the army has such a big stake in politics. This book therefore discusses different aspects of citizenship in light of the changing social and political circumstances that include terrorism and the rise of social media.

What is citizenship?

The idea of citizenship in this book focuses on the relationship between the individual and the state. Any understanding of this larger relationship has to encompass three different aspects as suggested by Joppke (2007, p. 38) – status,
