rights and identity. This definition also reflects Kivisto and Faist's (2007) understanding: they see citizenship as establishing the boundaries of the political community, defining who is in and who is out based on access to political life, as well as a sense of belonging through national identity.

The formal expansion of citizenship rights expanded over time from the civil to the political and further to the social sphere (Kivisto and Faist 2007). Going beyond the role and responsibilities of the state, philosophers have written about the ideal of self-governance that is based on the equality and equal liberty of all citizens. The concept of a mutually agreeable and reciprocal 'social contract' to which both the state and its citizens would adhere was born. This located citizenship squarely within democracy and largely Western literature has questioned if true citizenship can exist outside of a democratic system in the absence of political and participatory rights. This book takes the view that even in the absence of political participation there is a relationship between the state and the individual – albeit in a different form from democracies – and therefore the concept of citizenship remains relevant. This concept of citizenship in the context of Pakistan is linked to a 'security' state, where the traditional social contract has been greatly altered. The narratives in this book will highlight the nature of this altered social contract as the national narrative against extremism takes precedence over any ideals of 'rights and responsibilities' that may violate this state-sanctioned narrative. Furthermore, the book focuses on the macro relationship between the citizen and the state, not on the nature of citizenship at the level of the neighbourhood or city, which is also important in relation to the demands and expectations of citizens that might vary across neighbourhoods, cities and provinces related to 'everyday' existence (see Balibar 2010; Holston 2008).

In postcolonial countries, many of which are not necessarily democratic, the challenge of establishing a commonly agreed concept of citizenship has largely hinged on issues of defining national identity as opposed to rights, duties and political participation. Benhabib's definition of citizenship in the modern state as 'the collective identity of citizens along the lines of shared language, religion, ethnicity, common history and memories; the privileges of political membership in the sense of access to the rights of public autonomy; and the entitlement to social rights and privileges' (2005, p. 675) is more useful in postcolonial contexts as it engages with elements that emphasize the role identity plays as part of citizenship and acknowledges that these in themselves are diverse. In fact many postcolonial countries, especially in Asia, had as a political priority the establishment of a common national identity across ethnic, religious and
