linguistic boundaries, often using education as a political tool[4] to foster an often artificial unity based on imagined common bonds (Lall and Vickers 2009; Anderson 1983). Defining such a common identity allowed states to justify who could claim citizenship, and with it any rights, even if this was simply the right to live in a country.[5]

However, when it comes to defining citizenship, identity is often insufficient and rights, such as the right to political participation and freedom of expression and responsibilities, such as the duty to pay taxes, are still important, as is a general sense of legitimacy of the ruling government. In his work that examines how the concept of citizenship moved from West to East, Subrata Mitra expands on the relationship between citizenship and identity, arguing that only when both the legal and moral right to belong are combined, a legitimate sense of citizenship can develop. His point that the modern state has to work with traditional society is crucial in cases where in place of a nation there are diverse linguistic, ethnic and religious overlapping identities which existed well before the modern state was imposed:

> Just as the legal right to citizenship is accorded by the state, identity and following from it, the moral right to belong, is what people give to their claims to citizenship. When both converge in the same group, the result is a sense of legitimate citizenship where the individual feels both legally entitled and morally engaged. If not, the consequences are either legal citizenship devoid of a sense of identification with the soil, or a primordial identification with the land but no legal sanction of this. ... Orderly, legitimate citizenship is possible only if the concept is co-authored by the modern state and traditional society. (Mitra 2008, p. 348)

The relationship between national identity and citizenship is therefore a complex one, differing from country to country. According to the definitions above, identity is one of the elements of citizenship. However, citizenship goes beyond issues of identity as various groups within one state might have differing yet overlapping identities – ethnic, linguistic or religious – and should still be able to relate to an overarching concept of citizenship. For this, ethnic, linguistic and religious minorities need to be recognized by the state and in Pakistan there are tensions between historical realities, power and political will to accord equal citizenship to those who fall out of the mainstream definition of who is a Pakistani. Kymlicka and Norman (2000) have discussed the concepts of citizenship in diverse societies and have found that depending on the system, minorities sometimes are awarded special rights and sometimes have to play by the rules of the majority. Their work on multicultural citizenship