discusses different possible paths of resolving conflicts – legal, social and political strategies for acknowledging and respecting the cultural or religious distinctiveness of minorities – and provides case studies of alternative policies that represent trade-offs among competing considerations. Their work shows that Pakistan is not the only country struggling to accommodate all its citizens.

The relationship of religion, national identity and citizenship in Pakistan

Allama Iqbal (1875–1938), who is credited with conceiving the idea of a separate Muslim nation on the subcontinent, believed that Islam could be a binding force between people of various ethnic and linguistic origins (Islam 1981). The father of the nation, Mohammed Ali Jinnah, however, had decreed that religion would have 'nothing to do with the business of the state'. Thus the aporia of creating a secular state for the Muslims in South Asia which has plagued the debates around Pakistani national identity ever since (Lall 2010).

> In hindsight one can say that Pakistan was born with a temporary sense of national identity, developed as a reaction to militant Hindu nationalism. Various Muslim groups in the subcontinent were able to suspend their regional, ethnic, and linguistic identities. Religion – a way of life – had become the predominant force as a basis for nationalism, other ethnic factors being temporarily pushed aside. (Islam 1981, p. 57)

So what is the role for Islam in Pakistani identity? At an official level using the word Islamic as a way of describing the state was debated for years. The 1956 Constitution called Pakistan an Islamic Republic; the 1962 Constitution removed that label; in 1973 it was reinstated. These were signs that right from the start the issue of Pakistan's national identity was in crisis. According to Hussain this led to a division between the ethno-nationalists and the ethno-Islamists. For the ethno-Islamists the identity oscillated between being a Muslim and being a Pakistani. For the ethno-nationalists the identity oscillated between their ethnicity – Punjabi, Baloch, Sindhi, Pakhtun, Mohajir or other – and being a Pakistani (Hussain 1976, p. 924). However, the transfer of citizenship from primordial to national levels proved difficult and there was no platform for negotiation to represent the views of ethno-nationalists, missing out on the 'moral dimension' of belonging that Mitra had outlined (Hussain 1976, p. 923).

Nasir Islam sees the development of the relationship between religion and national identity as changing across different stages of Pakistan's history. At
