today's terror attacks were sown and this time frame is also when our narrative in this book begins. Taking part in what was perceived to be a US war against a Muslim country and seeing the Pakistani state, despite being led by a general, push US programmes and policies to promote 'democratization', led to even deeper divisions across society. Radical Muslim groups used Pakistan's pro-Western foreign policy to question the legitimacy of the state. Musharraf's intent to reform the curriculum and the wider education system was swatted by local resistance as the state was seen as more and more out of touch with the day-to-day realities of the general populace.

Musharraf's policies ultimately engendered one of the most high profile political movements calling for citizenship rights and state responsibility, decoupled from the usual aspects of identity, in the form of the 2007 lawyers' movement that many credit with creating greater political awareness among young people. However, once Musharraf was removed, the movement died. More recently the rise of Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) supported claims that young people are working towards a 'naya Pakistan' (new Pakistan), a claim further explored in this book.

In sum, citizenship as identity (in this case a common religious identity) was fostered while the legal aspects of citizenship relating in particular to rights, duties and political participation were neglected. This has created an important fault line in Pakistani society between individuals and the state as the state in effect operates in parallel with little or no connection to its citizens, unless citizens pose a threat to the 'national narrative', resulting in a 'security state' that makes its presence felt. Extensive fieldwork over nine years has shown increased alienation of the younger generation, who know their rights and duties but feel that political participation to change the system is all but useless.

Why a book on youth and citizenship?

Pakistan's youth population is one of the largest in the world. A recent United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) report (2017) focused on Pakistani youth offers the most comprehensive profile of the country's 54 million young people. The report estimates that Pakistanis under the age of 30 make up about 64 per cent of the country's population of 189 million, and 29 per cent – nearly a third (54 million) – are between the ages of 15 and 29.[8] The report says that human development can be achieved only through actively engaged citizens, while at the same time actively engaged citizens are an outcome of human
