collected in KP in this phase due to the security situation at the time. However, the respondents included a large section of Pashtun[10] residents in Punjab, Sindh and Balochistan. Further qualitative data was collected again between November and December 2011 and in December 2012; that included focus groups with students, and interviews with teachers and parents. This follow-up work was conducted through a classroom exercise held with students, usually from Grades 9 and/or 10. The classroom exercise was conducted in 15 schools with around 370 students. Most of the data was collected in the Punjab, but the research took place in all four provinces and Azad Kashmir.

In total, data was collected in twelve private schools, twelve philanthropic schools, ten government schools and five colleges and universities in urban, semi-urban and rural areas in Karachi, Daharki, Tando Allahyar, Hub, Quetta, Bahawalpur, Dera Ghazi Khan, Sahiwal, Lahore, Islamabad, Abbottabad and Muzaffarabad.[11] Data was also collected at three madrassas (one for girls and two for boys), one Jamaat-e-Islami private school (serving the middle classes) as well as from various Lahore higher education colleges.

The 2015–16 survey was conducted in three government sector universities and two private sector universities in the provincial centres of Lahore and Karachi, where the largest universities in the country are located. Students were from Lahore, Karachi, Quetta, Hyderabad, Sargodha, Dera Ghazi Khan, Rajanpur, Kasur, Peshawar, Muridke, Faisalabad, Sialkot and Sheikhupura[12] who were studying at government sector universities or took part through the online survey. A total of 258 surveys were collected in 2015–16. While the majority of the students were enrolled in undergraduate programmes, there were also students from graduate schools across disciplines ranging from the humanities to the pure sciences and arts that were included in the sample. While the nature of the 2009 survey was more directly related to questions linked to meanings around being Pakistani, rights and duties of the state and citizens, as well as perceptions of belonging and alienation; the 2015–16 survey expanded on these, asking participants about political activism and awareness, social media and the function of state institutions. The 2015–16 survey, while building on a similar overarching theme related to citizenship, was nonetheless different, asking students about current events in Pakistan. Both male and female students participated in this research, but results were not disaggregated for gender. While the analysis explores tensions between ethnicity, sect and religion, it discusses overarching youth perspectives. In addition to these four periods of intense and focused fieldwork, the book is based on conversations and interviews with