young people. This is especially important in light of the lawyers' movement against Musharraf and the emergence of the populist PTI, which claims to have the support of the 'youth of Pakistan' as well as the emergence of the PTM, that although based in ethnic grievances, transcends these. The discussion illustrates how the student activist, once celebrated by Quaid-i-Azam as 'an arsenal of Muslim India', has been predominantly depoliticized in today's Pakistan.

Chapter 3 gives the background on education in Pakistan. In order to understand the problem of political illiteracy among the youth in Pakistan, this chapter examines the nature of education and citizenship in relation to civic identity in Pakistan. It analyses Pakistan's education policy, curricula and young Pakistanis' opinions about the education system. The chapter argues that the Pakistani education system perpetuates an uncritical and often restrictive understanding of Islam and the Pakistani identity, teaching students to become loyal subjects rather than 'active citizens'. The chapter goes beyond the analysis of Zia-ul-Haq's Islamization drive of the 1980s, examining how even a reformed curriculum and a devolved education system after the Eighteenth Amendment has been unable to create 'active citizens' who feel they have a stake in the system.

Chapter 4 looks at terrorism. Terrorism is one of the biggest problems facing Pakistan today. From marketplaces being attacked by suicide bombers, to school children in Peshawar being targeted, terrorist threats are a part of everyday life for Pakistanis. This chapter explores the nature of this terrorist threat, especially the 'nontraditional' threats and the state's response to them, in particular the introduction of NCEPG 2018. The chapter examines what the security state has called a soft approach through a 'national narrative' on Pakistan that aims to challenge the ideology of terrorist groups, providing an alternative narrative for young people at risk of radicalization. The chapter further examines young people's views on terrorism, in particular their understanding of why terrorism exists in Pakistan. It also explores the pockets of resistance against the security state that exist in Pakistan but argues that the extent of this resistance and critique is limited. The students in this study in their assessment of the security apparatus have predominantly been in favour of the military and the state in its fight against terrorism, explaining the actions of the security state as a necessary response to the security situation that confronts Pakistan today.

Chapter 5 reviews the role of social media networks that are a more recent feature within the political landscape of Pakistan, and that have also become part of the security apparatus. This chapter examines the presence and policing of social media in Pakistan. It highlights how state policy towards preserving a
