and rural poor pitched against a small rich (and often feudal) elite. The state does not provide health and education for all; amenities such as water, gas and electricity are increasingly not available through public provision and have to be bought in the open market and are therefore only available to the middle classes.[13] Urban and rural infrastructure such as roads is often only built and maintained in elite areas, especially urban centres where the powerful can exert political pressure. In addition, poor economic conditions have led to rising prices and often shortages of basic foods such as rice, flour and sugar. The state also fails to collect taxes equitably for the improvement of public services. Another shortcoming in state duty is its failure to turn economic aspiration into reality. These failings leave a large part of the Pakistani population heavily deprived and decreases the state's legitimacy still further.[14] A largely corrupt police and judiciary compounds the lack of understanding of rights, especially for the poor.

When asked about Pakistan's problems the young people interviewed in 2015 reiterated many of the themes that came up in similar discussions between 2009 and 2012. The main issues highlighted included the energy crisis, bad governance, unemployment, terrorism, violence (such as target killings, muggings and sectarian killings especially in Sindh), corruption and the quality of the education system. Corruption, also the leading factor in Table 1.2, was recognized as a problem at all levels.

The participants connected the personal behaviour of individuals to a collective failure towards social responsibility by giving the example of citizen behaviour on the roads. It must be highlighted that this example also comes up in primary school textbooks in relation to following rules and regulations, one that was echoed across the participant population. They explained that the way citizens behaved in their personal lives, or even in the most mundane situations such as driving, where no one followed traffic regulations, reflected their lack of awareness for others and society at large. The problem of corruption and lack of accountability was prevalent across Pakistani society, from applying for jobs to accessing basic amenities such as electricity or clean water. There was no concept of honesty even at the ordinary person's level: 'From the rickshaw driver to the sweeper, everyone wants to take advantage of people, no concept of honesty' (Student, Female, Quetta). This lack of a moral code was also believed to be one of the reasons for increased violence in the country.

When asked if this was only the fault of the politicians, or if others such as the army or the police were also involved, the same group of students
