almost 4 million youth attain working age every year in Pakistan (p. 75). There is a need for more than 21 million additional jobs by 2030 (pp. 75–76).

The participants across the sample, while expressing their frustration with the state, also held little hope that the state would improve. Figure 1.1 highlights this sense of alienation. Of the 2009 sample 48 per cent said they were highly or very highly alienated.[19] In expanding on the meaning of this alienation the responses predominantly highlighted the failure or nonresponsiveness of the state in fulfilling its basic responsibility towards the provision of basic amenities.

It is generally assumed that anger and alienation are greater among the ethnic minorities who have suffered under Punjabi domination. Although this reduces the issue to ethnic grievances, it is true that the state has done even less for the non-Punjabis and Punjab remains the richest province with the best infrastructure, even if much of the natural resources come from other parts of Pakistan. As discussed in Chapter 4, the Balochistan rebellion has gathered pace as the Baloch feel deprived, accusing the state of not giving them their share of natural resources and distributing it to other provinces, in particular Punjab. In

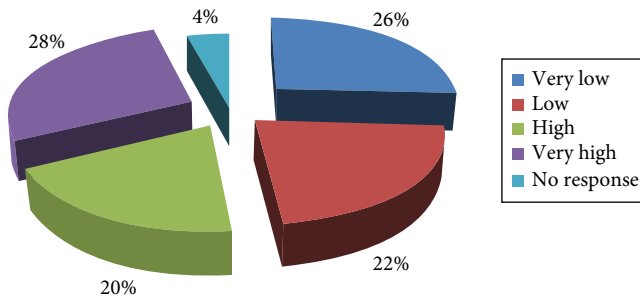

Figure 1.1 Sense of alienation across the 2009 sample.

Response	Sindh	Balochistan	Khyber Pakhtunkhwa	Punjab
Very low	21.6%	15.5%	18.7%	29.4%
Low	24.6%	20.7%	18.7%	22.0%
High	19.0%	8.6%	20.6%	20.3%
Very high	28.9%	53.4%	37.4%	24.7%
No response	5.9%	1.7%	4.7%	3.7%
Total	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%

Figure 1.2 Responses to degree of 'alienation by the state', varying by province of origin.