irrelevant in Pakistan: 'Apparently every citizen has equal and basic rights but sometimes these rights seem to be abolished' (Teacher, Female, Hub).

The views expressed across the sample also pointed to not just the rights but also the responsibilities of citizens. They were responsible as well for the breakdown of the state–citizen contract: 'It is kind of vague there in Pakistan, as people are more concerned of their rights and negligent of their duties, blaming the state for all miseries and troubles ignoring the fact that they also somehow [are] responsible for it' (Focus Group, Private University[41]).

In the 2015 survey the mindset had hardly changed, as students continued to give similar responses. Rights and duties, the basis of the social contract, are enshrined in Pakistan's constitution. Hardly anyone taking part in the focus groups had actually read the document. One of the students that had read it said: 'It is important. How can you talk about politics or argue if you have not read the constitution?' Others, however, agreed with the student who said: 'I don't think I need to read the constitution. It is the duty of our legal representatives to read the constitution. Not us' (Focus Group, Private University[42]).

In another focus group in Lahore only one student had read the constitution. She said that reading it had made her realize that the promises politicians make are already rights given to the citizens under the constitution. 'They take credit for something that is already given' (Focus Group, Government University[43]). However, the student population across the provinces acknowledged their lack of understanding about the Pakistani constitution. While a few expressed their embarrassment at not having read their own country's constitution, for most young people there was no point in knowing what was in the constitution, as nothing would happen: 'No faida'[44] (Focus Group, Government University[45]); or that it is too long and complicated: 'I think it is long and complicated on purpose.' Another said that he had thought about reading the constitution but had not done it yet: 'In a country like Pakistan ignorance is bliss … But we are supposed to know what it says.' However, it was felt that reading it would cause more stress and frustration. The same group of students were clear that citizenship meant 'understanding your rights and responsibilities', but it remained unclear how they would be able to do this without bothering with the constitution (Focus Group, Private University[46]).

The issue of corrupt and inauthentic politicians came up at several institutions. For the participants, politics was essentially considered a dirty word, for the morally corrupt. This was evident in the response of participants to the cricketer turned philanthropist turned politician Imran Khan, where his entry into politics was considered to be dangerous for him precisely because of
