its immoral nature, and the possibility that it would taint his reputation. The discussion also turned to expectations and responsibilities. While the majority view was of politicians as power-hungry opportunists who made false promises, there were students who pointed out that citizens also expect a lot: '[We] expect too much for politicians. … We ourselves are corrupt. [We] don't queue when we need to, break traffic signals. … We should also take responsibility' (Focus Group, Government University[47]).

While politicians failed in upholding their responsibilities, and continued to be a disappointment for young people, the discussion on rights and responsibilities also brought in the 'problem of sectarianism' and provincialism: 'The problem of sectarianism goes back to the constitution. The separation clause for Muslims and non-Muslims. That is where it begins' (Focus Group, Private University[48]). The failure of the state to guarantee equal opportunities and protect all citizens across Pakistan was evident not only in the continued persecution of different sects and non-Muslims, but also in the unequal representation of provinces in the army and bureaucracy, as well as the inequitable distribution of resources across the provinces. This sentiment was most clearly expressed by students in Karachi, as well as students from the Hazara community. Students gave several explanations for these disparities between provinces and communities: 'The army has always been Punjabi dominated. I think after the separation of East Pakistan the army has been afraid of other such movements so keeps it Punjabi dominated'; 'No I think it is because of the population, because they are larger in number [in Punjab]'; 'They say whoever wins Punjab wins Pakistan' (Focus Group, Private University[49]). The inequalities between provinces struck a chord across a number of discussions: 'It is the same as Karachi. Karachi generates 70% of Pakistan's budget but is given very little. KP generates energy but is given very little.' Q.: Where does it go? 'To Punjab.' Q.: Why? 'It is the biggest province in terms of population. Also the bureaucracy and army are dominated by Punjabis' (Focus Group, Private University[50]). In the focus groups in Karachi only one student disagreed: 'I think Punjabi domination is also a narrative created to an extent by the Balochi and Sindhi bureaucrats. They use this narrative to cover their own failure and the fact that under them no development has taken place within our own provinces' (Focus Group, Private University[51]).

However, the discussion of inequality across provinces also came up in focus groups in Lahore. In talking about Sindh, students believed that 'they hate Punjabis. Say Punjab has taken everything,' while for Balochistan there was a recognition that 'the other three provinces' had 'ganged up against them' (Focus
