root and to work, time is needed: 'Democracy needs time and it cannot be constantly interrupted. We are not allowing democracy to work'; 'We also believe that agar jamhooriat aajai gee tu humarei saarei maslei theek ho jain gei [if we get democracy all our problems will be solved] but it does not work that way. It needs time' (Focus Group, Private University[71]).

Despite the fact that in 2015 Pakistan already had had eight years of uninterrupted democratic rule, the students felt that more time was needed. They also believed that the regular coups of the army in the past had affected the function of a democratic system in Pakistan: 'The army has never really given space to democracy. We have never witnessed democracy in Pakistan, so we can't say democracy doesn't work when we haven't seen it' (Focus Group, Private University[72]).

In contrast with the anger expressed by many about the state, there is less resentment towards the army: 'I think the army has done fantastic work in the past but if you want to succeed as a state you can't give power to one institution' (Focus Group, Private University[73]). The normalization of the military not only in Pakistan's history and sociopolitical existence but also within the everyday lives of Pakistanis is evident with the inauguration of the Army Museum in Lahore that aims to celebrate and recognize the history of the army including its struggle and sacrifices for Kashmir.[74]

The role of the army and issues of security also brings up the role of military courts and how the army is dealing with terrorism and justice. Even those respondents who did not support army rule saw the use and logic of military courts: '[They are] not the solution but [there is] no alternative. [It is] useful in specific cases.' None of the students questioned whether military courts could be detrimental to the functioning of democracy in Pakistan. Most students agree that 'the alternative is not functioning too well. So for a limited period military courts make sense' (Focus Group, Private University[75]). After all, the army is there to protect them and they 'don't trust the political powers'. Since the 'Government can't even provide basic right to justice, that is why military courts [are] needed' (Focus Group, Government University[76]). Military courts were also described as 'more efficient', having 'more accountability' and being 'more stubborn. Question: Stubborn? You know they just do it. They get the job done' (Focus Group, Private University[77]).

The army for young Pakistanis is an institution that not only provides security but also guarantees swift justice. The success of military courts and the kind of confidence they inspire among young Pakistanis was often pitted against civilian institutions and their inability to provide justice. This was all the more surprising especially in the aftermath of the lawyers' movement, which brought together
