(Liaqat Ali Khan quoting Jinnah in Mirza 1989, p. 178), has been predominantly depoliticized in today's Pakistan. The chapter also looks at young people's views on political participation just before the elections in 2013, illustrating a lack of trust in the electoral process, with opinions about political parties and the structure of democracy in Pakistan ranging from apathy to animosity and disappointment.

Citizenship, democracy and student political activism

How does one gauge the effectiveness of a democratic system? Welzel and Inglehart's (2008) research on democracies uses a 'Human-Empowerment Model' which defines 'self-expression' as one of the factors linked to an 'effective democracy'. They argue that 'interpersonal trust, tolerance of other groups, and political activism' are 'the core components of self-expression values' which 'are far more important to the emergence and survival of democratic institutions than is mere lip service' (2008, p. 132). Sant's (2014) study of political participation in the context of Spain underlines two main paradigms in defining political participation: the 'old paradigm' that is limited to 'voting, joining a political party or becoming a candidate', and the 'new paradigm' that moves beyond the conventional and includes 'boycotting, network campaigning etc.' (2014, p. 12). This in some ways is also similar to Welzel and Inglehart's (2008) discussion of electoral and liberal democracies, and their argument that democratization increasingly includes the 'orientations of ordinary citizens' that moves beyond electoral votes. Hoskins et al. in engaging with the concept of 'active citizenship' include both 'knowledge and skills, and positive attitudes towards participation', as crucial factors where 'positive attitudes' are linked 'to participation in the community, in school and in politics' that 'tap both traditional (e.g. voting) and non-traditional forms of participation' (2012, p. 423). This understanding of democracy could further translate into what Bernard Crick calls 'political literacy' that includes 'not only knowledge of political and social institutions and ideas, but the skills, values and attitudes' essential 'for the practice of good citizenship' (1998, p. 64).

In Pakistan though, as Chapter 1 has illustrated, the level of trust citizens have in the democratic system, in the political system, is highly problematic. The space ordinary citizens have to 'protest' against the state has increasingly shrunk over the years as evident in the treatment of nonviolent movements such as PTM. Yusuf (2011) and De Souza's (2008) discussion (see Chapter 1) further highlights a lack of political engagement on the part of young people.