(Bajwa 2015, p. 12). According to Bajwa, the student movement became bigger, 'engaging' with questions around 'citizenship rights, democracy and national culture in a state that was in the process of establishing a coherent national narrative' (pp. 12–13).

This debate on rights and democracy is evident in the education policy documents that were published in later years, that kept referring to the problematic place of student unions and student protests. The Report of the Commission on National Education January–August 1959 published by the Ministry of Education (1961) highlights this problematic position of the student protestor. The report recognizes the sacrifices and contributions of the 'academic community' to the freedom struggle for Pakistan, but also highlights how students were being manipulated by politicians, where 'the influence of the teacher' was destroyed, and the 'moral of the academic community' undermined (1961, p. 39). As the report states:

> It is imperative that colleges and universities rid themselves of those who serve the ignoble interests of groups outside the academic community. The future of Pakistan will be poorly served by dissension, agitation, and political activity on the part of the academic community. (p. 40)

The Report of the Commission on Student Problems and Welfare[6] in examining the rise of student agitation concluded that the growing unrest among the student population was a result of universities being under-resourced. There were three main universities – in Karachi, Dacca and Lahore – which had lost their predominantly Hindu teachers and staff to India, and were largely unable to accommodate a growing student population. Despite 'new Universities' being set up in 'Peshawar, Karachi and Rajshahi, mostly by making make-shift or temporary arrangements' the grievances of the students were largely ignored. It was only after these grievances culminated in 'demonstrations and agitation' that 'the authorities became conscious of their chronic difficulties and redressed some of them' (Ministry of Education 1966, p. 11). For the commission then, the response of the authorities to such student agitation set a precedent for students who believed they could only be heard if they demonstrated or agitated. The commission attempted to present a balanced account of student demands and the problematic response of state actors that ignored these demands, pointing to the fact that students had to agitate out of desperation (Ministry of Education 1966, p. 11).

The problematic place of student unions for the Pakistani state was further evident in the student-led movement against Ayub Khan's regime that began as a
