resistance to the imposition of the University Ordinance. Under this Ordinance 'students could be rusticated; student unions were abolished; graduates could lose their degrees, and faculty fired without due process for a variety of reasons' (Kornson 1974, p. 126).

Even though they shared many grievances, student groups on campuses continued their rivalries. Nelson in his analysis of student union activism noted how in certain cases despite having similar goals, student groups who came from different ideological positions still continued to clash (2009), based on a rigid ideal of 'one state, one party, one way' (2011, p. 570). The NSF during the 1960s was further divided into factions, with the Jamiat strengthening its hold on student politics and winning campus-based elections at both the University of Karachi and the University of Punjab in the late 1960s, only to end up breaking into factions itself (Nelson 2011). Ironically, Ayub Khan, to counter the threat of the NSF and the Jamiat, patronized another student group, the transnational Tabligh-i-Jamaat, which claimed to be both apolitical and nonviolent, with Ayub employing the same tactics as his predecessors (Nelson 2011). The student unions, despite these setbacks, were nonetheless successful in leading a movement against Ayub Khan. In fact, Humaira Iqtidar in her work argues that the PPP only later got involved in a movement that had already gained momentum because of student action in bringing down Ayub Khan's government (2011).

The 1970s saw what Paracha terms 'one of the most democratic periods in the history of student politics' during which the government promoted student politics. The 1974 Student Union Ordinance allowed political activity on university and college campuses. Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's victory not only rid the country of Ayub's dictatorship, but also deepened the fault lines on the campuses between the Islami Jamiat-e-Talaba (IJT), that Jamaat-e-Islami (JI) had used for anti-Bhutto propaganda, and leftist groups. IJT started to organize study circles that appealed to students who came from more conservative rural areas and who according to Paracha could not relate to the radical left philosophy of groups such as the NSF. However, far from engaging with the student left, Bhutto started his own agenda of purging the left of individuals who were critical of his policies and alliances with the right-wing elite (Nelson 2011). NSF accused Bhutto of rolling back his original socialist manifesto and they were angry with him for sending the army to Balochistan.

Another student group that emerged in 1978, that would dominate student politics especially in the urban city of Karachi through violence and intimidation, was the All Pakistan Mohajir Students' Organisation (APMSO). Richards (1993)
