in her doctoral work traces the emergence and evolution of the APMSO and its ties to the Muhajir Qaumi Movement, not to mention the historic rivalry between the People's Student Federation (PSF), another student group that had emerged in affiliation with the PPP. In fact, APMSO has also been linked to the 'militarization' of campuses in the late 1970s. The predominant grievances that led to the emergence of the APMSO were based on ethnic lines, reinforced through the introduction of a quota system for university seats under Bhutto that was perceived to limit opportunity for the Urdu-speaking Mohajir community, with preference given to less educated Sindhis and in certain cases Pashtuns (Richards 1993). The nature of this confrontation between the PSF and APMSO at different points in the 1980s resulted in the kidnapping and in certain cases killing of students; in 1989 after Benazir Bhutto's government lifted the student ban the Karachi Rangers were called to the university by the vice chancellor, as violence got out of control (Richards 1993; see also Nelson 2011). As far as state patronage is concerned, Richard argues that there have been suggestions, though mostly 'speculative', that the government of Zia-ul-Haq, which had imposed a ban on student unions with the exception of the Jamiat, eventually had a falling out with the Jamiat who were critical of the 'pace' at which Islamization was taking place. To counter the power of the Jamiat (and possibly the PSF), MQM received indirect 'funds' from the military (Richards 1993). Richards further points to tensions between the parent political party and the student wing for both the MQM and the PPP, a strained relationship that would be true for other student political organizations as well, especially in times of violence where the parent political party pretended to distance or dissociate itself from the troublesome student group. The Jinnah Institute's research highlights how the 'tension' between the 'youth wing' and the parent political party might have been the result of the 'youth wing's' predilection for change or reform, while older senior party members were more inclined to the 'preservation of the status quo' (Jinnah Institute 2013, p. 15). However, there were also instances where the parent political party responded in support of its student groups, as was the case of the MQM. The MQM in response to the killing of its students withdrew from the PPP coalition, with the government eventually dissolved by the president for incompetency. The PML(N) government came into power with the Muslim Student Federation (MSF) linked to the PML(N) gaining power in Punjab, and in particular the Punjab University. However, as the Jamaat-e-Islami accused the PML(N) of ignoring the Sharia, with the MSF and Jamiat clashing, the Jamaat-e-Islami eventually left the PML(N) government's coalition, weakening its support which again eventually dissolved.
