protestors carrying black flags, banners and posters demonstrated in major cities throughout the country. In addition, groups of lawyers began to organize Thursday strikes at district and high courts, which were stacked with judges that most lawyers accused of being regime acolytes. By this time other judges who refused to heed Musharraf's orders had been suspended as well. Civil society provided support and soon the opposition parties joined the movement, all calling for Chaudhry and the other judges to be reinstated. In early November 2007 martial law was declared and the lawyers announced the launch of the Adliya Bachao Tehreek (Save the Judiciary Movement) to protest against it.

According to Ahmed and Stephan (2010, p. 497):

> Pakistani students, who were prohibited from forming unions during Musharraf's rule, surprised everyone by turning out in sizeable numbers to demonstrate against emergency rule. Students from the elite schools of Islamabad and the Lahore University of Management Sciences (LUMS), University of the Punjab, Karachi University, Quaid-i-Azam University, FAST University, Hamdard University, and colleges in major cities took to the streets along with their teachers to rally in support of the judiciary. Their banners read 'Adliya kee azaadi tak, jang karain ge' (We will fight until the judiciary is free) and prominent student slogans were: 'We will decide our own future', 'Justice now', 'Give justice to the judiciary', and 'Stop playing with the law'. As a price for their activism, hundreds of students, many of whom were active in various opposition parties, were badly beaten and imprisoned along with their teachers in Islamabad, Rawalpindi, Lahore, and Karachi.

The student movement included students from the elite university Lahore University of Management Science (LUMS), whose activities were documented by Martha Bolognani.[7] She notes how the elite student movement did not join the mainstream protests outside of the LUMS gates for fear of repercussions and arrests. The contribution of these elite students was more in terms of how they were able to push the debate into the international media and create an international audience for Musharraf's emergency.[8] Many young people started to engage in politics during this campaign, which saw more than 100,000 people on the street.

The lawyers' movement paved the way to a decisive opposition victory in the 2008 general elections, after which Musharraf was forced to step down from power. Later, after the civilian government led by President Asif Ali Zardari reneged on its earlier promise to restore the deposed judges, a new movement by lawyers, rights activists, media and civil society, backed by Nawaz Sharif's
