Stokesy had taken six wickets in the second innings. At his best, he is touched by genius. At his worst, he has had to grow up, fast. When I watch him now, I feel I played a small part in his development as a player and a person. He doesn't need me to hold his hand any more, but at certain times in his career he valued me being there, if he needed a second opinion.

I hope he learned a little from the way I went about things, when the scrutiny was intense and intermittently unfair. He has certainly changed radically after being cleared of affray following a street brawl outside a bar in Bristol in 2018. He knew he should not have been out on the town, in the middle of a series. It could so easily have been a horrible, defining moment.

He has learned his lesson. I see how he trains, how he prepares, how he cares about playing for England. The penny has dropped: he may be a maverick talent, but he will not be indulged. I needed the support of senior players, up to and including my spell as captain. People like Jimmy were there for me when I doubted myself.

I needed time to mature, to cultivate the humility to admit my shortcomings. I got a lot of things wrong, and learned that if you put your hand up, and admit your faults, it is possible to forgive and forget. You can't choose your teammates, and you are thrown together in an intense environment for up to four months, but if you love the game you will discover a set of values to live by.

Everyone has their individual priorities. International sport incorporates processes designed to manage pressure. Clashes are common because you are living on the edge. Conversely, it is also too easy to become lackadaisical. I respond if I see standards slipping, because if I do not do so the omission will grate on me. That doesn't mean to say, though, that I have a monopoly on wisdom.

This seems as good a time as any to apologize to a member of the England support staff on the 2018 tour of New Zealand. I won't mention him by name, on the assumption he knows who he is. We were awful for being bowled out for 58, and I criticized him for not being there on the first day because he was looking after his children due to his wife's illness.

'If this was an Ashes Test, you'd have been here,' I said, in a fit of pique and unworthy self-assurance. He denied it vehemently and, for forty-eight hours, we clashed massively. I have never shied away from stating uncomfortable truths as a captain, but on that occasion, I was completely wrong.
