understood, and broke into a huge grin. Words were superfluous; we both knew he was restored, relaxed and ready.

Sure enough, Haddin drove away from his body at Jimmy's eleventh delivery of the afternoon session. Matt Prior claimed a catch behind. I reviewed it when umpire Aleem Dar turned down our appeals. We formed a joyful scrum when the giant screens revealed a faint hot spot mark on the bat. We had won by fourteen runs and were being mentioned in the same breath as the boys of 2005, who had a two-run cushion at Edgbaston.

Jimmy, having secured his second five-wicket haul, was rightly named man of the match. Would things have turned out differently had I been sitting in the dressing room at lunchtime, stressing, fiddling and fussing? Probably not, but I was at ease with myself. Bawds approached me afterwards and asked if I had deliberately limited myself to a smile at that key moment.

Again, words were unnecessary. I merely smiled at him as well. I was getting the hang of this psychology lark.