it might be possible to ignore international arms limitation treaties and for Czechoslovakia to export weapons to Israel.

A secret operation would see thousands of Czech vz. 24 rifles and ZB 37 machine guns plus millions of rounds of ammunition delivered to the IDF. Critically, Czechoslovakia also agreed to sell combat aircraft to the Israeli Air Force. These were not particularly effective—being a modified version of the World War II German fighter, the Messerschmitt Bf 109, first used in 1937—but they were better than nothing and would begin to arrive in Israel within days of the new state's creation.

Through secret deals and the cooperation of a few nations, in addition to the production of arms and ammunition in facilities within Israel, the IDF was beginning to amass the weapons it needed to fight. Even though it was obvious to all in Israel that it would not be long before these weapons would be needed, war came more quickly than anyone could have guessed.
