fighting to resupply their armies and bring in and train reinforcements.

The ceasefire was particularly helpful to the IDF, which was able to distribute the arms and ammunition still arriving from Czechoslovakia and to train a wave of new volunteers for the IDF. The Arab nations too used this time to reinforce their armies, but they could not match the speed with which the IDF was growing and rearming. By the time that the first truce ended, the IDF forces actually outnumbered the forces of the Arab armies and were plentifully equipped with modern automatic weapons.

During the first phase of the war, from mid-May to mid-June, the IDF had been undertaking a desperate defense against larger and better-equipped armies. When the truce ended, the tables were turned, and the Arab armies would find themselves facing a larger and better-equipped IDF.
