settlements had been attacked during the civil war and that Jewish forces needed to maintain control over important roads in order to assure these locations of vital supplies.

As the deadline for British withdrawal drew closer, there was no clear path ahead that did not seem to involve the risk of more large-scale violence between Jews and Arabs.