the New York Women's House of Detention in November 1970, including those released as Angela Davis Speaks.[52]

Davis wrote during her incarceration to fight for her own and others' freedom. She began shifting discursive approaches, fusing her political and philosophical writing with literary close descriptions of places and encounters, especially dwelling on the walls and boundaries behind which she was imprisoned. Davis, in one of her own essays written for this collection, "Prisoners in Rebellion," writes, "The impenetrable concrete, the barbed wire and the armed keepers, ostensibly there to deter escape-bound captives also suggests something further: prisoners must be guarded from the ingressions of a moving, developing world outside. Discouraged from normal social life, its revelations and influences, they must finally be robbed of their humanity. … In utter disregard of the institution's totalitarian aspirations, the passions and theories of Black revolution and socialist revolution have penetrated the wall."[53] Davis's biographical recollection, as well her as poetic reflection and nonfiction prose, is put forth as a significant mode of struggling toward legal freedom. Revolutionary thought and action can, in essence, describe the repressive nature of prison walls and transform them into a porous structure and meeting place.

The publication of If They Come in the Morning aided the defense in myriad ways. According to Aptheker, the book launched with a first print run of 400,000 copies in the United States. Additional contracts were signed soon after with foreign presses in East and West Germany, Denmark, France, Greece, Japan, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Spain.[54] The expansive, global solidarity campaigns (including 200 officially linked U.S.-based groups and 67 in foreign countries) utilized the publication to raise awareness of Davis's case and that of the other political prisoners included in the volume.

During Davis's trial, both the widespread national and international attention influenced the case. Groups from both West and East Germany organized on her behalf, either through state-sponsored campaigns or grassroots efforts.[55] In her 1970 Angela Davis Speaks interview she notes, "The support from abroad has been overwhelming. All the socialist countries have lodged protests in some way or form. I was particularly pleased to hear of the activity that has been going on in Cuba and in Europe, especially in Germany, Italy and France. … Right now I receive from 100 to 400 letters a day, at least half of them originating from abroad, including many countries
