on subsequent visits. Davis bracketed the Berlin Wall in a sense, with an intended focus on other sites of division.

FIGURE 2.5 Peter Koard, “Davis, Angela, East Berlin: Visits East German Border with West Berlin,” September 1972. (Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-L0911-030)

Visual artifacts from her 1972 visit to the GDR reflect her perspective on the Berlin Wall. During her 1972 trip, following her acquittal and on a tour of Eastern bloc countries, her appearance and words indirectly acknowledged the Wall’s presence. On that visit, Davis was followed by state-affiliated photographers and writers. They documented her moves throughout East Berlin in official state events, visits to memorials, and at prominent spots close to the border. In one image, within steps of the Wall (fig. 2.4), she stands with hands clasped together in front of her while speaking to border guards. Davis stands with her back to a nearby guard tower and the border’s internal wall. There, as Davis faces away from the Wall, the photographer captures the border system as a vanishing point beyond the crowd exploring the area with Davis by foot. Images such as this could not convey the full scope of Davis’s movements, conversations, and glances that day by the border, but their place in state archives can