demonstrate imperatives to document and explore the scene with a particular point of view.

Another image at the border (fig. 2.5) depicts Davis as she stands in front of the Brandenburg Gate, holding a bouquet of flowers and meeting with border guards and activists. The image is shot from below, capturing the grandeur of the gate behind Davis. A GDR-produced pamphlet titled Peace, Friendship, Solidarity: Angela Davis in the GDR reported her meeting with border guards there who told her of their responsibilities and conveyed the story of Corporal Reinhold Huhn, a fellow border guard who was killed ten years earlier by a man fleeing to the west. According to the pamphlet, Davis committed to carrying this message back to the United States: "We mourn the deaths of the border guards who sacrificed their lives for the protection of their socialist homeland," Davis said. "When we return to the USA, we shall undertake to tell our people the truth about the true function of this border."[95] Davis demonstrated the potential for social coalition as she conversed with border guards. There, at the Brandenburg Gate, she again stood close to the Wall—without gazing in its direction, heeding its hazards, or calling out its infamous name. Instead, she directed her words toward other boundaries of repression.