project also greatly benefited from additional fellowship support that allowed me to pursue research sites and sources in Germany. While in Ann Arbor, I was a two-year graduate resident at the U-M Center for World Performance Studies (CWPS), which afforded me the opportunity to take significant early research trips to Berlin. I thank the late Glenda Dickerson for her service to CWPS and Cheryl Israel for opening opportunities for students to travel and research abroad.

I am grateful to the German Historical Institute (GHI) in Washington, D.C., for granting me a doctoral fellowship in the History of African Americans and Germans/Germany in 2010–11. Much of my research and the writing of my opening chapters occurred during this fellowship, which is a credit to the supportive intellectual environment at the GHI. Martin Klimke was my advisor and the steward of this fellowship program and the co-curator of my first exhibition (Leonard Freed's An American in Deutschland). I am grateful to my D.C. community of friends and collaborators, including Kate Damon, James Huckenpahler, Nilay Lawson, and Don Russell for their influence on my writing and curatorial work. While in Washington, D.C., I also benefited from collaborations and conversations with colleagues at the D.C. Jewish Community Center, the German Embassy, the Library of Congress, the Provisions Library, and the Smithsonian National Museum of African American History and Culture. Special thanks to Wilfried Eckstein and Sylvia Blume of the Goethe-Institut, who generously commissioned and supported the first iteration of my Wall in Our Heads: American Artists and the Berlin Wall exhibition.

After graduate school, my time as a postdoctoral fellow at Haverford College was incredibly productive and meaningful, thanks to a circle of thoughtful colleagues. Thank you Andrew Friedman (a brilliant scholar, generous mentor, and overall mensch), as well as Jim Krippner, Kristin Lindgren, Janice Lion, Lindsay Reckson, Debora Sherman, Gus Stadler, Terry Snyder, Theresa Tensuan, Sharon Ullman, James Weissinger, and many others. Extreme gratitude to students in my "Divided Cities," "Memory, Monuments, and Urban Spaces," "Philadelphia Freedoms," and "Queer Geopolitics" courses, including research assistants Zach Alden, Alliyah Allen, Freda Coren, Sarah Green, Evan Hamilton, Will Herzog, Amanda Robiolio, and Esme Trontz. Matthew Callinan, a dear friend and astute art mind, was a crucial collaborator for the Wall in Our Heads exhibition at Haverford's Cantor Fitzgerald Gallery. To my dear colleagues
