discipline the landscape and its people, as well as a plethora of instances in which shoddy workmanship and obvious cracks of a recently updated structure already dominate the view. Collectively, Tajiri captures dynamism and movement at the Wall. The rhythm of the artist's movements to document the Wall was more generatively staccato than exclusively even, incessant, monolithic, or standardized, in contrast to its builders' intended designs.

Through his study, Tajiri makes sense of the border in a way that opens understanding of the Wall as under renovation. Overall, he experiences the Wall as a social structure pertaining to the day-to-day enactment and negotiation of the border in both material and immaterial ways. Though he strives for completeness, or at least an accurate sampling, he never operates with a clinical totality. He forges a path, his camera as compass, to bring him closer to calibrating the Wall's sprawling architecture and acute curiosities. He weaves through the city to question how this structure functions as an outcome and technology of war and a scene of sublimated violence. He views land as mostly demarcated into clear distinctions of East and West, but in many streets boundaries are blurred, due to either the construction in process or the existing topography. In turn, the landscape holds the capacity to disorient the artist. He easily glimpses the residential balconies, backyards, and other habitual border crossings into East Berlin, at times surveilled by border guards who pointed cameras and binoculars at him. Alternately, he encounters places in which the ghost architecture of East Berlin by the border looks forlorn and frozen as a wasteland. As noted, graffiti at this time was not a common feature on the Wall, as we see its dull, gray facade, though a handful of central spots bear the marks of border guards' erasures by way of covered paint.
