views the pale sky. The signs' variations match the uneven structure of the Wall itself.

From there, Tajiri follows the path of the Wall northward, toward the section of Rudow and the Teltowkanal waterways. He is mostly uninterrupted by obvious human interaction, other than checkpoints, for what seems like several miles. The Wall, when close to him, in many cases appears as rudimentary as it did in 1961. When the next three American sector signs are rendered visible in images by bridges over the Teltowkanal, they nearly disappear into the imaged backgrounds, including several bridges that are intact but fenced and off-limits in Tajiri's explorations. Instead, cars parked in the foreground (including Tajiri's own Lotus) or leftover accessories of the canal's previous life, such as life preservers set out for swimmers of a bygone era, mark the scene's geography as marginal, if not also forlorn.

As he moves onward, Tajiri alternates between exacting location through his camera and abstracting the Wall and the space around it. For example, at the Sonnenallee checkpoint, Tajiri captures two images that appear as a continuous panorama when placed side by side. From left to right, we see guarded fencing and light posts beyond the Wall and, in the West, preparatory guided driveway for crossing and a decorative garden gnome atop a tree stump in the foreground. In the next image, we find a parked car and an American sector sign obscured by a tree. But, as Tajiri moves to the next site of imaging, we see the continuous landscape has been disrupted. This view, taken from an observation deck, shows two American sector signs along this crossing, which means the artist must have moved it out of his frame, along with the observation deck in the previous series. Later, at the intersection of Wegastrasse and Planetenstrasse, the street sign and an American sector sign are both unobstructed. All four languages of the occupied sectors are clearly noted, including Russian. The Wall behind comprises a bottom quarter of the frame, while the rest is composed of the open sky.

In the Treptow district, Tajiri encounters updated sections of the Wall behind elements of the older built border. Trees, shrubs, and property fences also clutter the view of this architectural revision by the East. Tajiri continues to use the American sector signs as visual landmarks, but their plotted positions are inconsistent in relation to the border structures around them. Whether posted in repeated fashion at crossing checkpoints or in
