Tajiri took the majority of the images from this survey in the city's internal American sector, the largest of the three allied zones. But he does not stop at its internal allied sectors, and he moves beyond Checkpoint Charlie near its northern interior edge, toward the bombed-out and untouched ruins of central Berlin, to the British and French sectors. Tajiri first travels on the margins of Potsdamer Platz, which, located at the bottom of the British sector, he views as a nearly empty void. The traces of previous eras of hyperactivity rise to the surface, including abandoned subway staircases and a void left across their surface. Next, Tajiri looks at and through the Brandenburg Gate as a window into East Berlin and varies his stance farther back, a fair distance west on Strasse des 17 Juni. With the gate and East Berlin's Fernsehturm visible on the horizon, he balances out the scene with a view of a nearby Russian World War II memorial, strangely located on the west side of the Wall, a by-product of the zigzagged nature of the city's division. The memorial is another oddity in the divided landscape, a strained space of symbolic and actual sovereignty in the midst of the western side of the city.

If Tajiri's previous sculptural projects were balanced commentaries between traditions of violence and technologically enhanced manifestations of war, his Berlin travels also shed light on the duality of willful militarism and arbitrary, even absurd, geopolitics. In these allied sectors, he views the Wall as a site of spectacular violence and mundane management, a structure that cuts up land as it follows and creates tense spaces and illustrates formidable battles between human control and nature's reclamation of such dividing lines. The artist initially felt the Wall as a magnet drawing him into its resurgent urban core, but he also understands it as embodying a duality, its paired repellent force. Just north of the Brandenburg Gate, still within the British sector, he encounters the ruins of the Reichstag, where a couple and their child walk through the sprawling field beneath its steps. There is little natural overgrowth here, as the lawn looks recently trimmed, but neither is it a hub of activity. Tajiri's view of the other allied sectors builds out his sculptural view of the Wall with additional adjacent and ghostly structures, partially ruined architecture, and nature's role in the reclaiming of empty spaces along the border.

In the northernmost allied French sector, for the final steps of his study, Tajiri finds more of a border and surrounding landscape under continued identity crisis, between calm and the impinging calamity of the border.
