Among the first scenes, he locates a tennis court and set of matches near Chausseestrasse. Without the Wall comprising the primary horizon line in his image, one might easily mistake the gentle scene for a country club. The lamps above the court are meant for nighttime play, not simply borrowed from the adjacent, illuminated death strip. The chosen image highlights the juxtaposition of urban leisure with the infrastructure of division. This oddity is matched in others he sees nearby, with children playing in the dirt at a French sector construction zone, a line of newly planted trees perhaps better suited for an orchard than a would-be war zone, and lines of cars casually parallel-parked near Bernauer Strasse.

In the French sector, Tajiri's status as neutral observer is tested in ways he had not accented previously. Tajiri climbs the slight incline of Bernauer Strasse and offers close-ups of four memorials dedicated to people killed while attempting to escape East Berlin. He hones in on the names inscribed —Ernest Mundt, Rolf Urban, and Ida Siekmann—and an inscription that commemorates a fourth, unidentified slain border crosser. Tajiri varies his approach with each but hones in on the materials used in the vernacular memorials themselves, which clearly incorporate elements of the border system, including barbed wire and wooden planks. The memorials do not float out of context of their western production, though they are nearly subsumed into and overshadowed by Tajiri's treatment. In a subsequent frame, his lens captures a nearby border guard in lockstep who looks back at him. Simultaneously another observer on an observation deck photographs that same border guard from above. These relationships between observers mirror the relational components of the Wall. This stage of the border's development is another study in looking for the tools of war; rather than overwhelming efficiency, power, or speed, the Wall and the forces of its adjacent allied sectors appear enmeshed in a moment of adjustment and disassociation. The fear of imminent conflict segued into status quo acknowledgment and stasis, but the shadows of violence remain. Whether as landmark allied signs or haunted traces of conflict, Tajiri's images adapt the border components into traceable abstractions themselves.

Tajiri took the last two dozen frames of his photographic sculpture in the northernmost region of West Berlin. Here, train tracks in the Pankow section become the predominant structure between East and West. In most instances, one gets the sense that Tajiri is riding the S-Bahn train, perhaps disembarking occasionally to view the scene. The images are in soft focus,