interest or necessary patience to print the series in full, but he continued revisiting the Wall project in new ways every few years. Tajiri's sculptural study had stalked the Wall's transformation from monumental front line and then adopted it as an object of reverence and experimentation.

Despite Tajiri's extensive work in divided Berlin's American sector, he did not pursue the same level of public engagement back in the States as he did in Europe. His works remained largely outside American purview, as he focused on his teaching and life in Europe. But he continued to interact with American artists who visited Europe, such as Leonard Freed, Kenneth Snelson, and Keith Haring, as well as others like Dorothy Iannone, who resettled in West Berlin from the United States. Tajiri found a passion for teaching at the Hochschule der Künste, which he continued through 1989. When he took his students on an international trip in 1985, the destination was not his home country but another famous wall: the Great Wall of China.

While most American viewers would have to wait years to see Tajiri's Wall works, one brief glimpse of his vision did make it back to art audiences in the States. Some of his aerial shots of the Wall were embedded in Yvonne Rainer's 1980 psychoanalytic art film Journeys from Berlin 1971. Rainer, a feminist choreographer and filmmaker, made the film in conjunction with a 1976–77 DAAD fellowship. She combs the contexts of Berlin's division for a film that is neither linear nor limited to the city of its titular framing. Even the inclusion of "1971" in her title, not the year of the film's production, misdirects. As Mesch suggests, "Berlin is a point of departure and not a destination for Rainer, and therefore the title of her film. … It is quite difficult to describe the film given its disparate quality, particularly in terms of the disjunction between sound and image." Tajiri's shots feature in this cinematic assemblage, with aerial footage that shows the Wall as elusive, not presented with the goal of comprehension, and appearing alongside other aerial footage of Stonehenge and street shots of Berlin and New York. Mesch adds, after "one of Stonehenge, which becomes increasingly legible … the other [is] an almost unrecognizable view of the Berlin Wall, slightly out of focus and difficult to make out or place."[45] Rainer credits Tajiri, but the work as presented disavows an apparent connection to Tajiri's extensive traversing of Berlin. Instead, the clip appears as disassociated footage, without the context of his creative or critical imperative to look closely at and scale the border to a workable view. Much of Tajiri's Wall works remained in limbo, too, far from the public squares and museums he was
