Knot was dedicated as an icon of survival, resilience, and renewed civic participation. In the tradition of Tajiri's knots, it also served as a space to question and explore reconciliation in the face of traumatic loss. That day, as part of the festivities and a gesture of gratitude, Tajiri received a key to the city, a symbolic artifact that opens no doors but harkens back to the divisions and loss of home in his American past. Tajiri brought the key back to Baarlo. He hung the commemorative key in his Dutch castle, in the hallway outside the wing that housed his studio, where he would see it whenever he returned from teaching, between his back-and-forth commutes to West Berlin.
