as in A Burst of Light (1988), a book of essays and edited journal entries written in the months surrounding her trip to Europe. These public modes of literary production evince Lorde's self-revealing, interdisciplinary poetic methodology. But they also hint at a cache of Lorde's unpublished drafts of poems, journal entries, photographs, and audio recordings left outside her readers' seemingly transparent access to the circumstances of her life.[10] This first 1984 visit and other trips to Berlin continued to profoundly shape Lorde's personal and published personae. But if such a constellation of works marks her moments of public productivity and healing in divided Berlin, it also lays bare her moments of difficult translation, skepticism, and persistent challenge, especially around legacies of racism and militarism evident in the city. Lorde's relationship to the city was as productive as it was fraught with complex negotiations, especially as she considered her sense of being alternately at home and on edge in Cold War Berlin.

FIGURE 4.2 Dagmar Schultz, "Party in Begine," 1984. (Audre Lorde Archive, John-F.-Kennedy-Institut für Nordamerikastudien, Freie Universität Berlin Archives)