venues such as Technischen Universität Berlin, Café Araquin, and Schokofabrik. As noted, Lorde, her partner Gloria Joseph, and Schultz visited with a group of lesbian writers in East Berlin.[40] According to Schultz, "We were at the time working with them; we were going to publish something they were writing [but it] turned out to be too dangerous to transport the material back and forth across the border."[41] In West Berlin, she joined an Easter Sunday demonstration against the U.S. deployment of Pershing II missiles, which led to the Amerika Haus. On the back of another picture from the day, the inscription reads, "Easter Sunday march—America House with police and moveable barricades drawn up in front to protect them from us."[42] Weeks later, in June 1984, Lorde read onstage at the Amerika Haus, including poems such as "Solstice," "A Woman Speaks," "Yankee Women," "Harriet," and "A Litany for Survival," before answering a question from the audience about the invasion of Grenada. She opened her question-and-answer session with an invitation: "A poetry reading is not a performance, it is something that is circular, it passes between us."[43]

To be sure, Lorde's time in Germany spawned a series of poetic possibilities, both for the German women she encountered and for herself. Lorde became a key figure in the emergent Afro-German movement, through and growing outward from her teaching. At the outset of her trip, she posed a question in her journal, "Who are they, the German women of the Diaspora? Where do our paths intersect as women of Color … [and] what can we both learn from our connected differences that will be useful to us both, Afro-German and Afro-American?"[44] Some of these women, as Lorde would learn, had African heritage that dated back to Germany's colonial occupation of Africa before World War II. Others were born to German mothers and African American GI fathers who had been stationed in Germany following World War II. In each case, these women were without identifying nomenclature or solidarity, often isolated or referred to by pejorative names such as Mischlingskinder (mixed brown babies) or "war babies." Lorde's time in Germany sparked an emergence of the very notion of "Afro-Germanness." Michelle Wright notes, "Afro-German activists most often point to Audre Lorde … as one of their most inspiring leaders and organizers."[45] Tina Campt also writes, "The thoroughly diasporic, cross-cultural exchange between [the movement] and Lorde contributed substantially to their articulation of their identity as Afro-Germans."[46] Lorde is credited in part for coining the term "Afro-German," and her
