She writes, “I am filled with a sense of urgency and dread: dread at the apparently random waves of assaults against people and institutions closet to me; urgency to unearth the connections between assaults. … You won’t find that information in the New York Times or the San Francisco Chronicle or GQ.”[89] Her writing aims to confront such disconnects and highlight violence and division as a part of geopolitics connecting home and abroad.

In “Apartheid U.S.A.,” Lorde goes on to draw many connections: between South Africa’s system of apartheid and “Nazi Germany’s genocidal plan for European Jews”; violence perpetuated against black people across the United States and around the world; and the effects of the global market on people of color as affected by Cold War era policies, including the Star Wars missile system and the support of South Africa’s apartheid regime. She ultimately calls for unity among people of the African diaspora in Europe, Asia, and the Americas: “The connections between Africans and African-Americans, African-Europeans, African-Asians, is real. … We need to join our differences and articulate our particular strengths in the service of our mutual survivals.”[90] Lorde’s vision of “Apartheid U.S.A.” reckoned with historical and current practices of repression as well as pathways for connection and coalition.

Lorde’s published journal in A Burst of Light includes eight entries located in West Berlin, drawn from a series that remain unedited in her archives. Alongside these Berlin entries are others from New York, Saint Croix, and Switzerland. Berlin again registers here within a global itinerary and imaginary, clearly mapping Germany into Lorde’s work. The poet refers here to plans to return to the city for more mistletoe therapy and to work with Afro-German women.[91] In these entries, the words “Berlin Wall” do not appear. And yet, complex elements of German history and division play out in the entries through a mode that recalls and complements her poetry. The people, places, and modes of memory she melds into poetics of diaspora lend themselves to healing and political advocacy. In her final entry, listed as the epilogue and dated August 1987, she brings several of those threads together of writing, healing, and traveling. She notes, “I go to Germany this fall for further mistletoe treatment. I look forward to working again with the Afro-German Women’s group.” She closes with a vision of division and diaspora in that is both personal and collectively minded and that looks forward to her subsequent return to West Berlin: “My most deeply held convictions and beliefs can be equally expressed in how I deal with
