FIGURE 5.2 Leonard Freed, Berlin, 1989/1990. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

Following his exhibition, Freed wrote to the director of the Haus der Geschichte, Dr. Jürgen Reiche, in January 2006, describing the latest vision for this book. Before they could exchange dialogue about this proposal, Freed lapsed into illness from the effects of his nearly ten-year bout with cancer. He died near his home in Garrison, New York, in November 2006. The retrospective exhibition he prepared in his final years, Worldview, opened a year later and traveled posthumously to Berlin in the summer of 2008.

Freed never finished "Ein Amerikaner in Deutschland," though he intended to continue revising his writing and share unpublished post-1989 images. With his instructions found in a series of folders in his home archive in Garrison, those writings and images were packaged into a new critical edition of Made in Germany, which I edited with support from Freed's widow, Brigitte, and the Freed estate. The book was published in honor of a 2013 exhibition at Essen, Germany's Folkwang Museum, and included a supplementary pamphlet under the title Re-Made: Reading Leonard Freed. Freed's reflections include poignant observations about Germany that balance the changes and continuities of the nation over the fifty-year period throughout which he photographed there. For the cover of the booklet, I selected one of Freed's signature images from Made in Germany, a 1965 view of an Autobahn traffic jam. In the image, one of its central figures depicted is his widow, Brigitte, with a hand over her face to obscure her identity. She stands outside their parked car on the side of the highway, with hundreds of cars shown at a standstill. On a highway known for its speedy travel and cultural associations with national progress, Freed's posthumous book captures a halt in movement to remind viewers of the uneven flows of Germany's history, as well as Freed's own unfinished work.[15]

After the publication of her autobiography, Angela Davis turned to engaged academic and activist work. She returned to the University of California system as a professor and publishing several germinal books in the fields of cultural studies, including Women, Class, and Race (1983) and Blues Legacies (1999). Outside of life in the academy, she ran as the vice presidential candidate on the Communist Party USA's election ticket in 1980 and 1984. Her vision for communism continued to transcend U.S. and Soviet borders. After the dissolution of the USSR, Davis was among the early members of the Committees of Correspondence for Democracy and