Socialism, an organization that sought to carry forward important political commitments of socialism.

Following the precedent of her autobiography, Davis continued to speak out on behalf of political prisoners and against the prison industrial complex. In 1997, she helped start the group Critical Resistance, with the goal of prison abolition. As their mission states, the organization "seeks to build an international movement to end the prison industrial complex (PIC) by challenging the belief that caging and controlling people makes us safe. We believe that basic necessities such as food, shelter, and freedom are what really make our communities secure." In books such as Are Prisons Obsolete? (2003) and Abolition Democracy (2005), Davis details how "a protracted engagement with the prison system has literally defined [her] life."[16] Davis joins her experience of her imprisonment with her critical work through highlighting the ramifications of mass incarceration, state violence, and criminalized dissent. The emphasis of her prison abolition work presents a political position that balances her experiences of her imprisonment with her role as a key leader in the emergence of the field. Davis's life work powerfully renders incarceration as a deeply foundational feature of life in the United States.

Davis continued to visit Berlin following its reunification, paying attention to grassroots perspectives on multiple forms of division. After appearances in solidarity with Occupy Wall Street camps in New York, Oakland, and Philadelphia, Davis also visited and gave a talk at the Occupy Berlin Camp in 2011. In each instance, she shared the links between previous eras of grassroots movements and ways to think through "occupation." In Berlin, speaking intermittently in German but addressing the crowd mostly with the help of a translator, she connected her own experiences in Germany with the contemporary activist movement located there. Greeted by a woman who had as a child written Davis a postcard for the Million Roses for Angela campaign, Davis shared, "I always say to people in the United States, that the schoolchildren in the GDR freed me," adding with a warm laugh, "And I should say that there were many people involved in West Germany as well."[17] In 2015, while in Berlin for a lecture, she attempted to visit the occupied Gerhard-Hauptmann school, where refugee activists demanding resources and fighting against deportation attempted to open an "International Refugee Center." Barred by Berlin authorities from entering the facility to host a lecture, Davis met instead with
