activists on the street next to a metal-fenced barrier, to discuss strategies and legacies of activism (fig. 5.3).[18]

FIGURE 5.3 Oliver Feldhaus, Angela Davis talks to refugees in front of the occupied Gerhard-Hauptmann School, 2015. (Oliver Feldhaus)

In the thirty years since the dismantling of the Berlin Wall, Davis's theoretical and literary recollections of divided Berlin have continued to echo her autobiography's strategic disavowal of the Wall. In public discourse, one would be hard pressed to hear or read Davis ever discuss the German border as "the Berlin Wall." For example, in 2010, as she prepared to release a new critical edition of The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, Written by Himself, she joined Toni Morrison, the editor of her autobiography, in a public conversation at the New York Public Library. The two distinguished women discussed a range of topics and offered a rare glimpse into the behind-the-scenes moments they shared in writing and publishing Davis's autobiography. In also discussing the financial crises of the recent years, Morrison brought up the Berlin Wall and did most of the talking. Morrison said,