projects to link prison abolition work and multiple sites of repressive division. She stated, “We’re talking about prisons, and checkpoints, and the apartheid wall … from the wall in Israel to prison-like schools in the US and the wall along the US-Mexico border.”[22] This speech, which was later included in her book Freedom Is a Constant Struggle: Ferguson, Palestine, and the Foundations of a Movement (2015), is a testament to the apartheid conditions in Palestine, which Davis describes in detail: “The wall, the concrete, the razor wire everywhere conveyed the impression that we were in prison. … We will have to expand and deepen our solidarity with the people of Palestine. People of all genders and sexualities. People inside and outside prison walls, inside and outside the apartheid wall.”[23] Building solidarity through sites of injustice, in and out of Berlin, Davis continues to remind us that if walls turned sideways can be bridges, freedom and repression can share the same resonant architecture.
